FED SETS OUT PLAN USING $600 BILLION TO SPUR ECONOMY

Bid to Pump Money Into Banking System Carries Fiscal and Political Risks

By STEPHEN L. HAHN and WILLIAM D. COHEN

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve on Wednesday unveiled a plan to pump $600 billion of new money into the banking system to help spur economic growth. The move, which would be the largest since the 1930s, would be financed by the Treasury Department and would carry significant fiscal and political risks.

The Fed’s plan, announced in a meeting minutes, would involve buying $600 billion of Treasury securities and other government debt. The Fed would then use the proceeds to buy up to $600 billion of government securities and other assets from the open market.

The plan would be financed by the Treasury Department, which would issue new Treasury securities to the public. The Fed would then use the proceeds to buy up to $600 billion of government securities and other assets from the open market.

The Fed’s plan would be the largest since the 1930s, when the Fed bought up to $483 billion of government securities and other assets from the open market to help finance World War II.
